The national dialogue on immigration and immigrant integration has increased in volume and intensity over the last decade in direct relation with the changing makeup of America’s cities and towns. As the issue takes a place at the forefront of public policy debates around the country, mayors and local officials are increasingly seeking new ways of addressing the issue for the betterment of their communities.

Many cities and towns do not have the resources available to create an office dedicated to immigrant issues. Creating a committee, commission, or council focused on immigration and immigrant integration issues is a way for these municipalities to face the growing concerns of their immigrant communities. Filling each of these bodies with volunteers will create opportunities for local community leaders to take a direct role in local government and many will be eager to take part. Establishing a committee, commission, or council is one of the most direct and effective methods for mayors and local officials to work with their communities and promote a spirit of collaboration and understanding with their immigrant populations.

In 2007, during the tenure of Mayor Mark Kruzan, the Bloomington City Council passed an ordinance that established the Commission on Hispanic and Latino Affairs. The Commission works to alleviate problems Hispanics and Latinos experience in education, health, employment and public safety. It recognizes that opportunities exist to improve social, cultural and economic challenges faced by Hispanic/Latino Communities. Local commissions are instrumental in encouraging the development of programs at the local level that focus on long-range solutions to issues facing Hispanic/Latino residents and bridging cultural gaps. The City of Bloomington is known for its atmosphere of diversity and it is fitting to establish such a commission for the community. All Commission meetings are open to the public.
