You have powerful resources within your community, your constituents, who should be a part of restoring your community’s fiscal stability. Creating effective processes and procedures in your community and developing crosscutting facilitative leadership skills to coordinate partnerships and funding strategies across interests are important. As a community leader learning how to convene the community beyond the usual residents who show up for everything, can offer you the innovative engagement you need to boost your city’s finances and pave the way for better economic development and community involvement over time.
